LORI NIX

b. 1969

Lori Nix's urban scenes reflect the spaces which celebrate modern culture, knowledge and innovation: the theatre, the museum, the cathedral and the vacuum showroom. Here, the monuments of civilization and material culture are abandoned and the notion of paradise lost is ironically manifested through the victory of the natural world in reclaiming itself. Evidence of human presence may still be visible, but the cause for their absence is left unclear; the narrative remains open-ended.

As a self-described 'non-traditional' photographer, Nix meticulously constructs her subject matter by hand and captures her images entirely in-camera, refraining from the use of digital manipulation. She builds painstakingly detailed, three dimensional dioramas, which often measure no more than twenty inches high, and can take up to an astonishing fifteen months to complete. Nix uses a large format camera to render her miniatures significantly larger than life size, infusing layers of irony and whimsy into the seemingly grandiose scale of her urban tableaux.
